The upcoming Fourth of July holiday makes us think about independence and what it means for small business owners. The issue often comes with entrepreneurs, particularly as an incentive to start a business. In a Facebook poll yesterday, we asked our Fans on Facebook about the main reason they became entrepreneurs. The vast majority mentioned independence and a desire to be their boss. Remember the moment you decided to declare your business independence? Have you met anyone inspired? Do you have a moment aha? Get fired? Maybe you always knew you were going to start your own business. This Fourth of July, we would like to join us in inspiring more people to take the plunge into business ownership. Tell us how you decided to do it. Upload a 30-second video describing the moment you commit to starting your own business on your YouTube account and send us a link to editors@entrepreneur.com by Ud., June 29. We will choose the most inspiring and ask our community to vote for their favourites through independence day weekend. It will be a great way to celebrate what a holiday is. Whoever gets the most votes will be awarded bragging rights in a follow-up blog post. Take our Facebook poll or share your thoughts in the comments below. Lessons are important, but so is disciplined practice. It can even be fun. Here are some guidelines to help you improve your reading and comprehension skills and become a better English student. Learning any new language is a time-consuming process, more than 300 hours from some estimates. Instead of trying and cingling a few hours of review once or per week, most experts say that short, regular study sessions are more effective. Just 30 minutes a day can help you improve your English skills over time. Instead of focusing on a single task for the entire study session, try mixing things up. Study a little grammar, then do a short listening exercise, then maybe read an article on the same topic. Don't do too much, 20 minutes in three different exercises is a lot. The variety will keep you engaged and make the study more fun. Reading English-language newspapers and books, listening to music, or watching TV can also help you improve your written and oral comprehension skills. This way repeatedly, you'll start unconsciously absorbing things like pronunciation, speech patterns, accents, and grammar. Keep the pen and paper handy and write words you read or hear that are unfamiliar. Then do some research to find out what these new words mean. Use them the next time you play roles in a classroom dialogue. Non-native English speakers sometimes struggle with certain word pronunciations because they don't have similar sounds in their native language. Similarly, two words can be syllable, but are pronounced quite different (for example, hard and said), or you may encounter combinations of letters where one of them is silent (for example, K in knife). Homophones are words that are pronounced in the same way, but are written differently and/or have different meanings. There are a number of homogens in English, which is one of the reasons why it can be so difficult to learn. Consider this suggestion: Pack your clothes, then close the suitcase. Both clothes and closure sound the same, but they are written differently and have different meanings. Even advanced English language students may struggle to learn intentions, which are used to describe the duration, location, direction and relationships between objects. There are literally dozens of intentions in English (some of the most common include his, on, and on) and a few tough rules about when to use them. Instead, experts say, the best way to learn intentions to memorize them and practice using them in sentences. Study lists like this are a good place to start. You can also improve your English skills by playing vocabulary games related to what you are studying in class. For example, if you're going to study English on holiday-focused topics, take some time to think about the latter and what you did. Make a list of all the words you can use to describe your activities. You can play a similar game with grammatical reviews. For example, if you're going to study paired verbs in the past, stop thinking about what you did last weekend. Make a list of the verbs you use and review the different times. Do not be afraid to consult the reference materials if you are stuck. These two exercises will help you prepare for class, making you think critically about vocabulary and Repetition is key as you learn English, and writing exercises are a great way to practice. Take 30 minutes at the end of class or study to write down what happened during your day. It doesn't matter if you're using a computer or pen and paper. By making a habit of writing, you will find your reading and comprehension skills improve over time. Once you're comfortable writing about your day, challenge yourself and have fun with creative writing exercises. Choose a photo from a book or magazine and describe it in a short paragraph or write a short story or poem for someone you know well. You can also practice your letter writing skills. You're going to have a good time and you're going to be a better English student. You may even discover that you have a talent for writing. I hope you all have a wonderful holiday (those of you in the US, anyway) with famie and your friends. I started this weekend in a bit of melancholy, but a neighborhood picnic yesterday was exactly what I needed to lift my spirits. The Fourth of July means an annual picnic around here, and last year I felt like a fish out of the water, acutely aware that my husband and children were gone and I was all alone, surrounded by a sea of families. This year, I felt different - I wasn't alone at all. Instead, I was with friends who, like me, have gotten over the shock of watching Peter load up a truck and drive out of the neighborhood. We laughed, we looked, we played games, we saw fireworks and it was all good. Very, very good. As I sat watching the fireworks last night, I felt the usual patriotic bloating that I get over the things that explode in the air - I was the child of a military family, after all. I know the price of the freedoms that we all sometimes take for granted. It really made me realize how very lucky I am to live in a country where people can legally separate and move on with their lives as they see fit. How many more countries wouldn't allow that? Or allow the husband the right to make that decision? How many women sit in a room, wishing to be where I am, surrounded by friends, living my life, working in a job that pays me a living income and raising my children with the support of so many? This is only one part of freedom for which we should all be most grateful. I certainly am, and this year, I feel it a lot more. Independence. It was worth fighting for. Delays can cause barriers of up to 12 hours and persuade some business owners to consider transporting goods by air to avoid the lines. But truckers aren't the only ones waiting in line at the border. Borders. school senior Melissa Sánchez starts her day at 5:30 a.m., though the class won't start for hours. Sánchez lives in Ciudad Juárez and goes to school across the border in El Paso. Trucks wait in a long queue for border control to cross into the U.S., on the Cordova-Americas border crossing bridge at Ciudad Juarez. Jose Luis Gonzalez/Reuters I leave my house as, at 6:20, 6:30, Sánchez says. Then we get in line to cross the border and wait about an hour and a half, usually. But nowadays, since things have gone a little crazy, we wait two to three hours, so I have to wake up early. Many migrants also line up, waiting, in the same hallway that Sánchez goes to school. I think it's really sad to see them sitting around waiting for a miracle to happen in their lives, she says. Because I have the privilege of going to school, having a family, I see these poor kids. They didn't have a place to stay, and that's the only thing running through my mind. Sánchez walks with her mother over the walkway and sees the migrants waiting, but has not spoken to them. There's little interaction. Drivers wait in line to cross into El Paso, Texas, at the Paso del Norte International Border Bridge in Ciudad Juarez, Mexico April 3, 2019. Jose Luis Gonzalez/Reuters Sánchez's school, the Lydia Patterson Foundation, is a private Methodist School. It is also bilingual and about 70% of the 350 students come from Mexico every day. Socorro de Anda is the president of the school and has worked there for more than 30 years. The school itself opened in 1913. Generations of students have passed through here, de Ada says. We are here to create leaders on both sides of the border. Sánchez says she's wanted to study in the U.S. since she was a child. And also that I wanted to meet more people, more cities, more countries. He got a full scholarship, like many students at the school. But now, the school is preparing for possible border closures, even if they're temporary. De Ada met with the students this week. [I] told them not to worry about it, he says. I want you to worry about your school work. They also have a plan for back-up, for each We are ready to be able to transmit our classes through computers if necessary, and they can take their classes there with their computers or tablets or even their mobile phones. We have a plan. De Ada says she doesn't think she's going to need the plan, but she's worried. He says the possible closure of the border That night. Read more: 2020 Democratic candidate Julián Castro just released the most detailed immigration plan of any candidate and will reshape the U.S. system I can't see borders closing for too long, he says. Honestly, I can't. It would be devastating for the state of Texas and it would be devastating for the whole country. And despite the longer lines, De Ada says the students will go to school on time. Many of them do so by standing up even earlier, like Sánchez. It's really hard, to take a step up and say I have to do this, he says. Sánchez slept seven hours a night. Now, with the longest lines, it's more like five. Five.
